While in the still more important question of their morals, and moral example, any diminution in a debauchery which at present appears to have no limits but those set by coercion, would be cheaply purchased at any price. ON THE LOCATING OF BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA. The first desire which naturally suggests itself to the mind is, that the choicest climates which that continent affords, should, as far as political and military considerations will permit it, be rendered available for the residence of the European forces maintained in India. importance From my first landing in India I became, from of an early * - > 7 movai of con- peculiar circumstances, so extensively eneraered in valescentsto a r J a o temperate cli- the charge of European troops, that it required but little discernment to perceive, in numerous instances, that were an immediate removal to a temperate and [readily accessible climate practicable, before organic disease was established through relapses, many a constitution might not only be saved from destruction, but become as well fitted to endure any necessary residence in the plains of India, as if previous illness I had not occurred. Availing myself of the opportunity, in medical charge of the European troops at Kurnaul, I obtained leave early in 1824, a year after my entering the country, to visit the Himalayas, with the object of studying the character of the climate. From different...
